IV. Most people would agree that "beauty is in the eye of the beholder;" that is, everybody has a different and what is not. And in fact, researchers in different fields have collected convincing evidence that examples the same way. However, researchers do not agree on whether the factors which is	ven people from different cultures tend to

IV However, researchers do not agree on whether the factors which influence how most people judge beauty come from genetics (nature) or culture (society). Devendra Singh, a psychologist, conducted an experiment in 1993 to find out if different men found different female body shapes attractive. Dr. Singh gave drawings of different female body shapes to a variety of men and asked them to choose the most attractive body shape. Even though the men came from a wide range of cultural backgrounds, they all tended to rate the "hourglass" body shape as the most attractive. Body shape, not weight, seemed to be viewed as the critical factor for attractiveness by men in this survey. Dr. Singh explained this result from the perspective of evolution. Women who develop an hourglass shape have a relatively high level of estrogen, the female hormone. Because estrogen levels also influence fertility, men may subconsciously view these women as good candidates for producing children. Over time, evolution would favor men who have inherited genes from their fathers which influence the selection of this type of fertile woman. Douglas Yu, a biologist, has a different theory about men's ideas of beauty. Dr. Yu thinks that culture, especially culture developed through exposure to the media, has had the largest influence on how men judge beauty. In order to test this, Dr. Yu traveled to southeast Peru to interview men in an isolated community far from the reach of modern television, movies, and magazines. Through his own survey, Dr. Yu found that the men in this isolated community preferred heavier women with wider waists, and not particularly women with "hourglass" shapes. Because this small community has lived apart from western mass communication, their own culture has not been influenced by outside standards of beauty. Dr. Yu points out that this group has experienced the same genetic evolution as all humans do, but their own culture has defined beauty by a different standard.
